Teacher Directions: Cut the sentence strips out. Make enough copies of the level-appropriate case study so that each student has their own. Give students quiet time to read and understand the case study. Then pass out a sentence strip to each student or half the class. Ask everyone to stand up, find a partner, and ask their partner the question on their strip. The other student will use the case study to answer the question. Then the student will give their strip to their partner, (or exchange strips with their partner if all students have their own strips). Then both students will walk around and find different partners to repeat the process. Students should repeat this process many times so they have the opportunity to say, hear and answer many different questions.
